It is this potential loss of the meditative aspect of human nature for which he fears and this is the main focus for The Memorial Address. Heidegger believes the meditative quality of human nature is related to man's sense of origin and each man's connection to his or her homeland. he uses the terms autochthony and rootedness to express this. The loss of rootedness is directly connected with the loss of meditative thought, and one does not need to leave one's homeland in order for this to ...

Martin Heidegger's "Memorial Address" is more than a commemorative speech honoring composer, Conradin Kreutzer. Heidegger takes this opportunity to bring to light a pressing issue. The philosopher concerns over the societal imbalance between calculative thinking and meditative thinking, favoring the prior. This topic at this given event holds so much significance because he is speaking to an audience who is currently experiencing the issue he speaks of, and could easily apply it to ...

Martin Heidegger's memorial address, delivered in Germany in 1955, is both a call for action - not only to the people of Germany, but to the population of man across each continent - as well as a notion concerning the future of mankind. When described using elements of rhetoric, or styles rather, these very specific directions Heidegger chose to take his speech fall into two distinct but concomitant classifications: deliberative and epideictic.

Martin Heidegger' essay "Memorial Address". Read Martin Heidegger's essay "Memorial Address" from the short book Discourse on Thinking. In that piece Heidegger argues there are two kinds of thinking: calculative and meditative. He then argues that while meditative thinking is the most fundamental type of thinking for humanity, it is being neglected and marginalized more and more by the kind of calculative thinking epitomized by modern science and technology.

An attempt to enact meditative thinking is carried out by Heidegger himself when, during the "Memorial Address," he tries to conduct the audience from a situation where they are passive 'consumers' of the address to a situation in which they actually meditate and think about what is going on, beyond the simple event of commemoration. What follows is a long quotation which I think can give us a picture of what the process of meditative thinking is about:

1. Memorial Address "All of us, including those who think professionally, as it were, are often thought-poor; we all are far too easily thought-less," says Heidegger. "Thoughtlessness is an uncanny (unheimlich) visitor in today's world" (44). We think one thing after another, only to forget it just as easily-thinking is cheap, marked by quantity without quality.
